The western deserts of America are scenes of desolation on account of the great quantity of alkali. Notning will grow on these barrens but sage brush and "grease wood;" and the water of the few small streams is unfit to drink. For hundreds of miles the same monotony prevails bones lie and bleach along the trail; animal life is unseen, and the blinding glare and intense heat is almost unbearable. Even on the Union Pa cific Railroad these alkali deserts are crossed, and it costs that line eighty thousand dollars yearly for "water trains" to supply the engineers. Un der these circumstances, artesian wells are now being bored at different stations. Six have been begun. They are from seven hundred to one thousand feet deep. The water is fit to drink, but holds much mineral salts in solution, Engineers do not like to use it, as it encrusts the boil-
